The discrete element method (DEM) is used to simulate the deformation of a polystyrene sample under an imposed temperature gradient. The MD model is validated for a discrete number of polystyrene samples. A full map of the temperature distribution is constructed using the MD model. The finite element model of the sample is constructed to match the geometry of the MD model. The full map of temperature distribution is applied to the finite element model to obtain a map of deformed shape. The relative errors in the predicted and simulated temperatures and deformations are quantified. The MD model and finite element model are then used in a physically based simulation. The physical damage of the sample is evaluated by comparing the predicted stress and strain field to those from published experimental data. With the full map of temperature distribution, it is possible to predict the local damage within the polystyrene sample. The distributions of stress and strain are in good agreement with the published experimental data. A physically based simulation of thermoplastics material behavior would be useful to predict the effects of heating gradients, laser shaping, or the number of heat cycles on polymeric parts.Q: How to switch between output streams in Java? I have a Java application that sends output to a log file. I'm now also trying to switch to a different log file, based on user input. I get warnings and errors in the file, I'd like to see them in my Eclipse debugger. So here's what I tried: java.io.PrintStream print = System.out; This prints on the console, but I have other messages I'd like to switch to the debugger. PrintStream debug = System.out; This overrides the normal output, but when debugging the console outputs are still there (but not the log file). PrintStream debug = new PrintStream(new BufferedWriter(new FileWriter("debug_log"))); This does the opposite, but I haven't found out how to switch the outputstreams, and the debug messages disappear. For reference, this is what my code looks like: PrintStream print = System.out; PrintStream debug = new PrintStream(new Buff
